CATALYZING LGBTQ HEALTH RESEARCH

Honor #TransVisibility on Transgender Day of Remembrance

This Tuesday, November 20th marks the annual Transgender Day of Remembrance, a time for communities to come together to remember transgender people, gender expansive individuals, and those perceived to be transgender who were killed because of hate. Given the current and escalating threats to #TransVisibility, we have a powerful and important opportunity to honor the transgender community by expanding their representation in health studies. Queer visibility in medical settings and in medical research is critical to improving the health and health care available to our community. Read more about this latest threat to #TransVisibility from our own Dr. Juno Obedin-Maliver on our blog.

Dr. Obedin-Maliver with PRIDENet Peer Ambassador Dr. Jamison Green and Dr. Dre Irizarry.

Trans health goes global.

In the spirit of (loudly) advancing #TransVisibility, we'd like to shine a spotlight on one of our Community Partners this month: WPATH \(the World Professional Association for Transgender Health\) works to promote evidence-based care, education, research, advocacy, public policy, and respect in transgender health. WPATH just hosted the 25th Annual WPATH Symposium in Buenos Aires, Argentina where Dr. Juno Obedin-Maliver had the honor of presenting.

We are so grateful to all of our Community Partners – so many of whom directly serve the trans community – for their tireless work to expand diversity in research. Please show them some love!

Talk less. Listen more. (For the good of All of Us.)

Delivering quality health care requires a mix of skills. Unfortunately, listening – truly listening – is a skill that some health care professionals can lack. But that's changing! In order to help educate providers about how to meet the diverse needs of their patients, Sophia Kass, PRIDENet's All of Us Research Program Peer Ambassador and Positively Trans Program Associate for the Transgender

Law Center, recently co-led one of several community listening sessions being held around the country. Read more about Sophia's experience here.
